Some of the participants' suggestions was:

- the participants believe that the new law should precisely define the rights and obligations of the unemployed on the bureau and have accurately acceded to these rights and obligations.
- This Law should not only prescribe the rights of the unemployed, but the opinion is that the achieve of their rights should be linked to the fulfillment of their obligations
- They certainly expect unemployed people to actively engage in job search and to be active participants in all active employment measures
- Unequivocally consider that all rights that are achived, including the right to compensation for the unemployed, the right to retraining and education, the right to employment mediation, and even to the keeping of records for the unsatisfied, should be reciprocally set up to fulfill their obligations under the law
- Employment services need to build an individual approach to job seekers as well as to employers...

The general conclusion from this Round Table is that all participants are equally in favor of adopting a new and clear Law on Employment and Social Security of Unemployed Persons, which will greatly increase the number of employed persons and ultimately resolve the issue of a large number of persons registered in the Employment Service on a different basis.
